Back in 2019 when the first season of Witcher released on Netflix, I watched the show with a mixture of confusion and intrigue. A few months later my wife got the video game Wild Hunt for my birthday. When I told my friends—whom themselves were Witcher fans—that I was going to use the weekend to “dig into it,” my one friend in Boromir fashion replied, “one does not simply ‘dig into’ the Witcher.”

Man, was he ever right.

I spent the next year playing through the entire game. I hit every checkpoint on all the various maps, went through all the side quests, customized all of my outfits, and played both DLCs. In short, I became a completionist... or degenerate—one in the same thing? I read the books, comics—I went down a Witcher wormhole. So, what would be the coup de grâce? Creating a piece of Witcher fan fiction, that which you’ve just read.

I’m not lying when I say this short story was a blast to create. To this point in my comic career I haven’t worked on any licensed IP. With my body of work being what it is (mostly kids and all-ages comics), I think I would’ve had a better chance of winning a fist fight with a rock troll than being hired to create a real-deal authorized Witcher comic.

But alas! Here is my take on Geralt, and I’m proud of it. My partner in crime Corey Ranson killed it on the colors. Editors—please hire him if you need a colorist on your next project. As you can tell, his palette is top notch.

If you want to check out more of my stuff, I have a graphic novel, Wolves: Tooth and Claw, and a comic series called Panda Force, all available on Amazon.

I also have a comic on Webtoon called Power Girl Mob.
