What type of content should you create?

Content should be aligned to the buyer's journey.

Determining a starting point can be tough

As marketers and sales people, we understand that the buying and selling process has changed. Today's IT buyers want to engage with content that is relevant to where they are in the buying process. Someone who has already realized they need to modernize their data center doesn't want to read an infographic on why they should "modernize their data center." Since they are already aware of their challenge, they are more interested in engaging with content that focuses on how solutions work, or maybe something like a comparison. That means that you have to start thinking about creating the right content, and delivering it to your customers and prospects at the right time – before your competition has a chance to influence them!

Map content to your buyer's journey

As you start to think about the types of content you need, here are some content topic ideas based on different parts of the buying process, as well as some examples of projects that we've created for our clients.

What types of media should be used?

The content topics above can be translated into almost any type of digital content. The type of content you should create really depends on your campaign needs, as well as budget. The next several pages overview some the types of digital content we can create for your organization.
